If "cotton is king" in the South, so is pork in Cincinnati. A reporter for one of the Cincinnati papers has been on an exploring expedition to the hog-killing territory of Deer Creek, in the outskirts of that city, and details his experiences at length. A single gang of hands in the establishment which came under his supervision, kills and prepares for the packer's work a hundred hogs an hour. each careass passing through the hands of every individual of the gang. The reporter saw a magnificent specimen of the genus sus driven into the killing pen in the flower of hog life and activity, and five minutes after he contemplated his corpse, relieved of internals and externals, white and clean, and in fact, mere "pork," slinging by his heels in the distant drying house, awaiting the salt and brine. So the operation, much more accelerated sometimes, goes on through the whole day, the hog travelling more rapidly in death, through the hands of the killer, the bleeder, the scalder, the picker
